that he had not made any bids for any part of the work, and was not interested in the contract any more than to learn how they did business in the South. He said that the city lays all of the sidewalks at once, and the abutting property owners are assessed for their proportionate share of the work. In this way the owners get the advantage of the large contract price while in this city the sidewalk in front of each piece of property is a separate job and costs more money. At Charleston, S. C., he said, the city contracts for laying of sidewalks. At Pensacola the director met George Randall, a Bridgeport boy, who is a sailor aboard the U.S. torpedo boat McDonough which was a part of the torpedo fleet which is laying in the harbor. The police court at Pensacola, he said, would make a hit in vaudeville, and the cops all wear their six shooters strapped on the outside of their coats.

The hustle and bustle of the place would not make one dizzy. The director saw a grocer's cart driven by a negro and drawn by a mule with the inscription "always on time" on the side of the wagon. Milk peddlers come
